ON THE COVER

From auto parts to appliances, to a can of soup and more, coiled steel is a key raw material in making a wide range of modern consumer goods. Moving the gigantic rolls from mills to the manufacturing plants has long been a job for railroads, using cars built especially for the job. A special trough interior secures the coils, while removable hoods protect them from weather and simplify loading or unloading. Factory finished with etched metal walkways, installed grab irons, colorful paint and lettering, and much more, adding a fleet to your railroad is a snap with Walthers newest HO scale replicas (932-42154 series shown on page 8)!

Did You Know? Some abandoned railroad right-of-ways were later converted to public trails.

These add interesting detail to modern urban or rural areas. With gentle grades, broad curves and wide spaces, they can be used year 'round. Surfaces can be dirt, gravel, crushed stone or pavement over any roadbed available in your scale.

Other trackside details, such as a restored bridge, or depot rest stop add interest, but be sure to include small things like mile markers, small piles of ballast, signal bases and more as well.

Did You Know?

"Gooseneck" lamps can still be found on structures and signs.

Named for the long curving conduit businesses and industries installed them above doors, stairways and anywhere workers needed light. They were also used on roadside billboards, as well as rooftop and wall-mounted signs. At railroad facilities they were commonly used above station signs as well as on canopies, platforms, and servicing facilities.

Widely used into the 1980s when brighter high-intensity-discharge lamps became available, many different styles are available for modeling.
